running angles out of the backfield. You can run a stretch play with a lead blocker, or a downhill iso to the deep back - or the Quarterback! There's just a ton of options to this variation on the Inverted Wishbone. See if you can get it in the playbook.

4 Formations Your Offense Should Be Using

The Diamond formation is a physical formation. Your players will grow to love how they are able to physically punish the defense and move the ball down the field and the explosive plays that it can lead to in the passing game.

Using the Diamond Formation to Create Mismatches

On this particular play which is zone to the left the left halfback will cross the formation and cut off backside pursuit by the defensive end. The right halfback will flash fake in front of the QB and run an outside sweep path and the tailback will run his zone course.

Pistol Diamond Offense (Ep. 3) Power Play

The Cloudy LB/Corner has two movements: chase the snag route or drop back into the fin route. At the snap of the ball the quarterback will open up, stick the ball backwards at the running back and look at the Read LB. If the Read LB drops back then he hands the ball off to the running back and then FAKES THE THROW.

The last imbalance that the DIAMOND ATTACK creates just as a formation is the use of balanced, UBL/UBR and by going tight or wide with the strong-side tight end. Or use that tight end in the backfield or as a BB. In the end we felt very confident that the Diamond Attack was a formation that we wanted to use as a series or main formation.
