Colors. The colors predominant in the descriptions of the settings of The Hunger Games are more than descriptive details; they also convey the novel's themes by vividly contrasting the different places in which characters live. The first setting readers encounter is District 12, and in particular the Seam, home to Katniss and the mining community. The miners—men and women—are hunched from their work and perpetually grimy with the coal dust embedded in “their broken nails, the lines ...
