The 5600 is known as a thyristor flash. The thyristor part is a transistor-like switch that automatically turns off the flash when it figures the camera has received enough light for a good exposure. These are also known as Auto Flash or Automatic Flash (as opposed to today's TTL Flash).

The 5600 is sort of like a 285 on steroids. It features: Automatic mode, TTL mode, and manual full power, 1/4 and 1//16th power. Has tilt/bounce/zoom head. Head can be removed...Vivitar made different heads for these, but the standard zoom head is the only one I can remember seeing. Has lighted LCD display to show ISO, distance, zoom, aperture.

Has anyone used a Vivitar 5600 flash with a Canon 60D. I was going to buy a new flash but if I can use the 5600 (which works perfectly) I will stick with it instead of throwing it out. I believe the voltage is around 7-8, Thanks for any help.

Re: Vivitar 5600 on a Canon 60D: Canon EOS 7D / 10D - 80D ...

But I do know that if this flash really is capable of TTL metering with the camera and lens you have, then you can use any aperture you want, and the flash will provide the proper exposure for it. I believe the Vivitar 5600 has a advertised GN of 120 feet with 100 ISO film. So f/5.6 would get you 21 feet with 100 ISO film. F/11 for 10 feet.

vivitar 5600 flash system - Greenspun

I have a Vivitar flash that is either the same as this, or very similar. The guide number is probably 60 for feet, 18 for meters (which is the same thing). You set the ISO of your film on the sliding scale.
